

Department of English

The Department of English offers majors in English and English Education, both leading to the Bachelor of Arts degree. The Department seeks to develop a love of literature by introducing students—majors and non-majors alike—to the pleasures of discussing and becoming familiar with great literary works in English, American, and world literature.

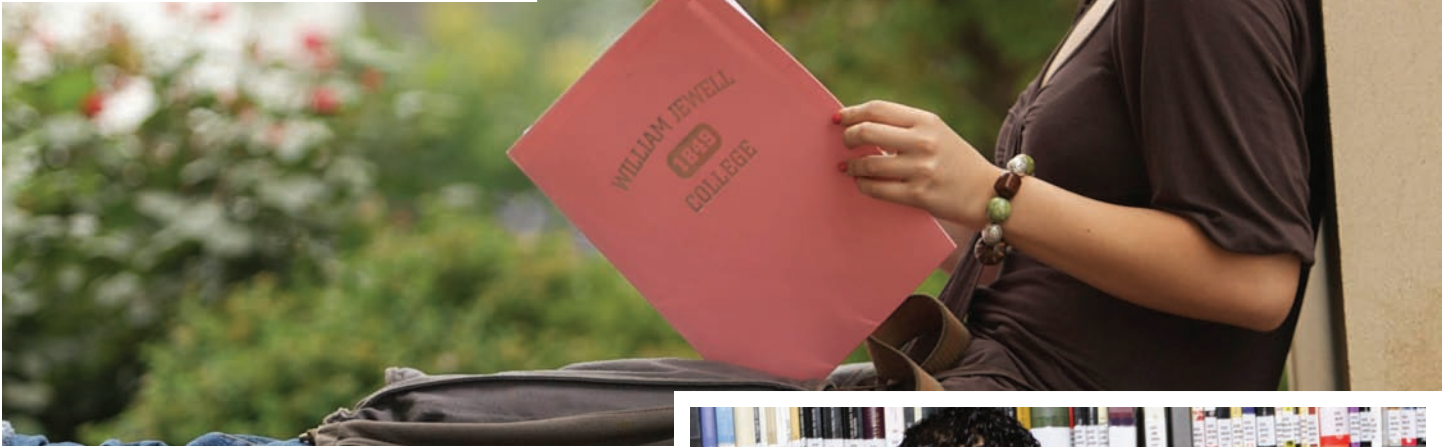

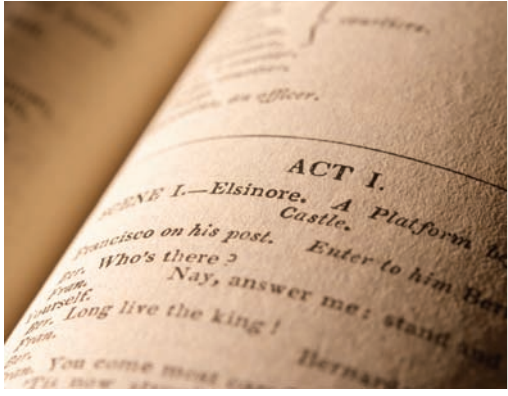

Students pursuing a degree in English at William Jewell College:

- Will be widely read in major works in the English, American, and world literary traditions;

- Will develop familiarity with contemporary critical theories and reading strategies;
- Will become proficient in methods of independent reading and literary research;
- Will become proficient and fluent in writing in academic as well as workplace-related contexts.

About the Major

The William Jewell College English major uniquely links the study and appreciation of great literature to the development of student writing skills for the changing American workplace. The William Jewell English faculty believes that the strong writing skills which can sustain individual success in today's career environment are best founded in the vital understandings of language fostered by the close reading, intensive discussion, and careful writing that comprise the core of traditional literary study.

Degree Programs Offered

The Department of English offers majors in English and English Education, both leading to the Bachelor of Arts degree. Students wishing to pursue the English Education major must double major in Secondary Teacher Education. A student may take English as a primary major only in the B.A. program. The English major as a second major combined with a B.S. primary major does not require the additional B.A. degree courses.
